

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

CHILD'S CHRIST-TALES

ANDREA HONER

William B. Cairns Collection of
American Women Writers
1630-1900

William B. Cairns
Professor of English
University of Wisconsin-Madison

QW

~~27~~¹⁰
25⁰⁰
2-88

135

Signed inscription

Chicago World's Fair / Woman's Press int'l. T.

• (Woman's Temple Printing Association = WTPA ??)

With my love to
Mabel Lindsay Gillespie
And in memory of the Children's Building
Andrea Hofer

Child's Christ-Tales.

Chicago, World's Fair
June 18-97

CHILD'S CHRIST-TALES

BY

ANDREA HOFER

ILLUSTRATED

CHICAGO:
WOMAN'S TEMPLE.
MDCCCXCII.

Copyright, 1892
By ANDREA HOFER

W. T. P. A. Press

Rare Books
Cairns

BT

302

P7

1892

To the Child
Marie Annette
And the Boy Cousins in the West
these stories are dedicated

CONTENTS

FRONTISPIECE

The Christ-Child—Murillo

The Promised Plant A Parable

David and John A Prophecy

The Manger The Fulfillment

Illus. Holy Night—Correggio

The Stars and the Child

The King's First Journey

Illus. The Sphinx—Olivier

St. Anthony and the Child A Poem

Illus. St. Anthony and the Child—Murillo

The Christ-Child Adapted

Illus. The Guiding Angel—Murillo

The Boy in the Temple

New Year's Message

Illus. New Year's Blossoms

The Flower Carol A Poem

The Old Bell

The Carolers

Christmas Wreaths A Poem

THE CHRIST CHILD.
(Murillo.)

The Promised Plant.

The Promised Plant.

THERE was once a promise made to all the people of the world, and every one was waiting and had been waiting long for it to be kept.

No one could remember who made the promise, but the little children were told that it was made by a great King who knew everything that had ever happened, and all things that would ever be.

And this was the promise :

A wonderful flower was to grow in a certain garden that would bring to the one who owned the garden all the good things in the whole world.

Every one waited and waited for the flower to come. Years and years they had waited,—summer after summer ; each new little boy and girl that came into the world was told of the great promise, and among the very first things they did was to go about seeking the flower and asking questions about it.

But no one could tell them anything except to repeat the promise that a beautiful gift-plant would some day grow upon the earth, which only people with loving hearts could see, and they should be greatly blessed.

Every one in the whole world went about looking for this flower, even though they did a great deal of work and thought of other things, yet they never quite forgot the promise.

Many of them prepared the soil and made beautiful gardens to receive it. Some sought far and wide for rare seeds and bulbs which they planted and watered, but only such plants grew as every one had seen before and so they still waited and searched.

Many others, wished and wished, and some prayed and prayed, but the precious seed did not come.

The rich men of the land had great parks laid out; the ground was tilled and everything kept ready for the plant to find root. Many gardeners and watchers were hired to stay there and watch for this wondrous flower and guard it,—but it did not come.

Yet no one ever doubted the promise, for every one wished very much to have all the good things which were to come with this flower.

Among all these people there was one very kind woman, who did many good deeds. She loved and cared for little children who had no one to help them. One night when she came home from her work, what did she see in a little broken flower-pot that stood in her window?

A tiny plant which she had never noticed before! She watered it and it grew and grew and she learned to love it.

One day while she was looking at the tiny plant, she remembered the promise, and said quietly to herself, "Can it be that this is the beautiful flower the whole world is waiting for! I think it is, for it has made me so happy."

And it was the flower.

She knew the promise had come because it made her so happy.

Every one, far and near, came to see it ; and they begged pieces and seeds to plant. And though the good woman gave of her plant, it grew larger and larger, and she became happier and happier.

One day it blossomed wide and beautiful.

The rich men who had made great parks and gardens for the flower would not believe the woman had received the real promised plant. They shook their heads and laughed at it all and went on seeking after other seeds and plants.

But the people who believed because they saw how happy it made the woman, to whom the flower came, brought rich gifts to her and begged for the seed and they took it home and planted it everywhere that the whole world might be filled with joy and peace.

David and John.

David and John.

SO MANY things, that children love to hear, happened very long ago. This story of David and John is an old, old story and we only remember it through the songs and legends that have been told and related by the great story-tellers and singers of years long past.

David was a shepherd boy.

He tended sheep in his father's pastures, and in the long days of the summer, he watched the young lambs play round the mother sheep. He sang to them and played upon his harp—for he loved them; and he loved the warm sunshine and the green meadow with all his heart.

All of David's people owned pastures and raised sheep. They were people who loved their country and its people, with a deep love, and they had taught their children to love God most of all.

So David, while he led his sheep through the green pastures and beside the still waters, thought many thoughts about these things.

The nation to which David belonged had received a promise in the beginning, that there would some day come to it a King to rule and bless its people.

This King was to come from God and the whole world would bow down before him.

David, when he was out in the sweet fields, would sing of this promise and with his fingers touch the harp in time with his voice, until, it is said, the flock gathered round him and listened.

And there, amid his sheep, he learned to love the King who was to come ; and deep down in his heart he believed that the promise would surely be fulfilled.

And it was.

There was another youth called John, who received the same promise that came to David.

He lived a long time after David, but the great King had not yet come.

Still no one had ever doubted the promise, for the nation was very unhappy and had had great troubles, and was looking and longing for a wise ruler to help them. They all thought this promised King would come in great glory and sit upon a throne with beauty and grandeur all about him.

As a boy, John passed his days under the sky in the fields and woods. He ate fruits and honey, and had never seen a city or many people.

His father and mother had told him many times of the promised King, but John knew very little of what thrones and rulers meant, and even less of what the world was thinking. But he knew that such a man as would come from God, must be a perfect man who would know and do only the good.

John left the wilderness and woods when he became older and went out among the people, and when he saw how strange were their thoughts of this man of God, who was to come, he told them they must look for their King as holy and pure, not as a worldly king.

God put it into his heart to make clear to these people, and tell them of this King who was to come quickly.

Many men and women followed after John wherever he went, for they loved to hear his words. And great numbers believed, watching every day more eagerly than before for this King, the Son of God, who was to come and be their ruler.

THE HOLY NIGHT.
(Correggio.)

The Danger.

The Manger.

THE great King did come upon the earth, to all the waiting people.

The world had grown so tired that it was beginning to forget the promise, and just when they least thought of it, lo ! it came true.

On the first Christmas morning, before the light had come, the great King came upon the earth.

It was the same King that David had sung of, and the same King that John had told about ! The same King the world had waited for !

And this was how it came about.

Shepherds were watching their flocks by night, and they dreamed that their King had come. They awoke suddenly and saw a bright light and they heard voices which told them to follow the beautiful star which was standing high in the heavens, for its light would lead them to where the King was.

They arose in the night and followed the star a long way, when suddenly it stopped and hung over the very place where they were to find their King. And they went in; and lo! they found that their great King was only a tiny babe; its throne was its mother's knee, and its palace was a manger.

Wonderful stories are told by those who came to the manger and found the little child. They saw a bright light above it, that lighted its face and all about it. And they brought gifts and laid them at the mother's feet.

They called the babe their King, for they believed it was the child of God. The shepherds went out among the people full of joy and thanks, and told all they met of the babe that was born to be their King.

The Stars and the Child.

The Stars and the Child.

LONG, long ago,—so long that even the old gray hills have forgotten,—the beautiful stars in the sky used to sing together very early every morning, before any of the little people of the world were up. Their songs were made of light, and were so clear and strong that the whole heaven would shine when they sang. One morning, as the stars sang and listened to each other, they heard a beautiful music coming swiftly toward them. It was so much louder and sweeter than their own that they all stopped and listened, and wondered. It came from far above them, from out the very deepest blue of the sky. It was a new star and it sang an entirely new song that no one had ever heard before.

“Hark, hark!” the stars cried. “Let us hear what it is saying!”

And the beautiful star sang it over and over again, and its song told of a lovely babe that had come on earth—a babe so beautiful that it was the joy of the whole world. Yes, so beautiful that when you looked at it, you saw real light streaming from its face.

Every little child in the world has light in its face, if we but know how to see it—but this little one had so very much that its mother wondered as she looked down upon her lap and saw it there. And there were shepherds there to look at the babe, and many other people saw it and could not understand.

But the one beautiful star knew—yes it knew all about it, and what do you think it knew? Why, that this child was God's own child, and was so good and loving that the whole world when it heard of it would want to know how to be so, too.

This one beautiful star traveled on and on, telling all the way what it knew of the child, and its light fairly danced through the sky, and hung over the place where the little one lay.

All the other stars in the heavens were puzzled. They heard the song of the wonderful star that had come such a long, long way, and saw its brightness.

The words of its song were, "A loving child, a loving child is on the earth."

And as they listened these stars all looked down to find the child, but they could not see so far. And the strangest part of it all was, they could not sing their old songs any longer, the sweet new one was so much more beautiful, and so they sang that : "A loving child, a loving child is on the earth !"

It was said that although they did not find the beautiful babe of which the great star sang, they are still seeking and listening and waiting. Every quiet evening they look down upon each little child, right down into each little heart, and ask, "Is this the child that is really loving?" They peep out of the sky just as the dear little babes are being tucked into bed, and down they peer, right into the windows.

That is why the stars come just at bedtime, for then they know where they can find the loving child. It is in its dear mother's lap, the light is shining in its face most of all, for it laughs up into the sweet eyes, and love seems all over everything. The stars know, for they have watched for many long years and some day they will surely be satisfied.

And when they do find a truly loving child, a child with a shining face, a trusting heart and gentle ways, they will shine out brightly and sing with joy over and over again, "a loving child, a loving child is on the earth ;" and again the heavens will light up and the wise men come and the manger be filled with shining, and the whole world will listen over again, and remember about the wonderful child that was born and is come again.

REST.

The King's First Journey.

The King's First Journey.

IT IS told that this King took a long journey when he was only a tiny babe.

The prince of this world heard from the shepherds how they followed the star and how they found the child with such light streaming from its face that surely it must be the new King sent from God, of whom David had sung and John had told, and for whom the whole world was waiting.

And the prince of this world trembled for he feared lest this infant grow up and be made king in his place, to sit on his throne and rule his people.

And he sent soldiers out over the land to find the child and take him away.

One still night an angel of the Lord told the mother of the King's thought and asked that the child be taken quietly away until the prince should forget.

And Mary, the mother, told her dream to Joseph, and Joseph brought a beast of burden before the morning light came and put the mother upon it and the little child in her arms. Then with the halter in his hand he started out on foot towards the south, to Egypt for there the angels had told them the little child would be safe.

Before they reached the land of the great river Nile they must pass many long days plodding through the hot sand, and it would have been a weary journey had not so many wonders happened.

Poets who love the gentle-hearted babe, and sing almost as David sang, have told us of this long journey through the south. They say the light with which he was born never left his face and lighted their way. The palm-trees stooped to give them fruit to eat. All the dangers of the desert passed them by ; dry rose-bushes bloomed anew and filled the wide bare land with perfume, and the mother put them in her baby's hands.

Again the poet tells of how they rested by the wayside, and as the sun stole across the sky, the leaves of the tree under which they sat moved with the sun to shade the baby and his two beloved ones. And its shadow rested on them all day long to keep the spot cool whereon they sat.

And soon they came to where the great rock-hewn figure spread itself in the sand. The people of this land of Egypt loved to cut these wondrous figures from the stone and worship them.

Joseph led the beast up to the place and it was evening so they stopped to rest.

And on the breast of the great Sphinx the mother leaned and the babe was in her arms. Joseph kept watch by the slow fire and strange things he thought as he watched the smoke curl toward the soft southern sky.

Two years they wandered about the river Nile. And there the child's soft feet took their first steps which afterward led so many friends into right paths ; and there the baby's lips first learned to speak to the mother's eyes,—those lips which since have spoken the sweetest words in all the world.

And this is the story of how the babe was saved from the cruel King.

And in two years, back they came to the little white-roofed city of Nazareth and to the quiet home where Jesus grew to sweetest boyhood.

ST. ANTHONY AND THE CHILD.
(Murillo.)

Saint Anthony and the Child.

Saint Anthony and the Child.

ONCE there lived in Padua, a boy,
So calm and gentle, loving, meek and mild—

The village wondered, and his folk
Were puzzled at the goodness of the child.

Each day he lovelier grew, to both
The eyes and hearts of all his mates in youth,
That they gave up the palm to this
Gold-hearted, gentle lover of the truth.

How did he show his kindness ?
Why friends, sweet friends, 'twas just in serving men ;
In giving up his moments, pleasures, joys,
His own self's claims to happiness, for them.

What did he do for them? what tasks?

'Twere hard to tell. From early morn till late

He did such quiet loving deeds—

That no one knew, and none would try to state.

He stopped in passing at each door

And watched the little ones with loving eyes ;

He gave the mother comfort—helped

To tend the flock and still the infant's cries.

He calmed the anxious, sorrowing ;

He labored with the poor and cheered the old ;

He taught the sick that upward-looking

Which brings them joy and peace of heart untold.

He knelt oft by the sea and looked

Upon the vast, the throbbing heart

Of grandeur which the Lord had given

To the ocean's soul and to his own in part.

His lips sang songs to answer back

The melodies with which the great waves played

Up to his feet ; and the songs were sweet

As if the earth and heaven prayed.

Oh his was a great heart, beloved ones.

When manhood set its crown upon his
head,

He did such holy, gracious deeds to men,

And left his home and life for theirs instead.

That light and love which on us shines,

Shone into him — this man of mother-heart—

Good things we only dream to do,

He loved to do, and did the double part.

Once as he knelt beside the sea,

It seemed as though there came a holy child,

And nestling stayed within his arms,

Close to his father-breast, so warm and mild.

The babe remained in his great arms,
And looked straight up into his earnest
face,
While lilies sprang beside his path,
And clouds of cherubs hovered o'er the place.

And there beside him on the sand,
The beaut'ous infant 'neath the lilies lay ;
The great saint bent above its form,
And watched and longed that it might ever stay.

The legend tells how the mother called,
But the baby lay and waited long,—
For the loving heart within the saint
Was sweet almost as the mother's song.

He felt the heart of Love had come,
To beat within the bosom of a child,—
The Babe, the Christ, uncalled had found
His arms. He held it close and smiled.

Within his breast a rapture lived
When long the vision fair had fled,

And glorious lights shone over all,
That circled close and rested round his head.

Of Anthony, the saint, whose love
For children taught the whole world how to love,
We tell this tale, and place his name
All but one holy name above.

We look upon his tender face,
The painter taught us was his very own,
And love the Child his arms inclose,
And say his Holy name with tenderer tone.

THE GUIDING ANGEL.
(Murillo.)

The Christ Child.

The Christ Child.

A LONG, long time ago, on the night just before Christmas, a little child, all alone, wandered in the streets in a large city.

There were a great many fathers and mothers hurrying home with bundles of presents for their little ones, and some rolled past in fine carriages, one after the other, bound for home to celebrate the happy time with their children.

This little child seemed to have no home, but just wandered up and down, looking into the windows and watching the lights. No one seemed to notice the little one except Jack Frost, who bit the bare toes and fingers, and the North Wind, who almost brought tears to the child's eyes with his blowing. It was cold, oh, very cold that night.

Up and down the street the little child passed, and the walks were all snowy and icy. The child had on neither shoes nor stockings ; but though it was cold, the little one was glad, for it was Christmas eve, and the whole world seemed to be glad, too.

Everywhere the light was streaming out of the windows, and if one looked in, there could be seen the beautiful candles and the Christmas-trees. In some of the houses the trees were loaded with presents for the children, and in one place, into which the little child looked, the boys and girls were playing and skipping, and their merry laughter rang so loudly through the house, that it could be heard through the thick walls and doors, out in the street.

The little child was glad with them, and clapped its hands and said, " O, they are so happy in there ! Surely they will share with me, and let me come into their warm, bright room and sing and play."

And the little feet tripped up the great wide staircase, and, without a fear, the child tapped softly at the door.

And the door opened.

There stood the tall footman. He had on gloves and shiny shoes, and a huge white cravat ; he looked at the child, but sadly shook his head and said : " Go down off the steps. There is no room in here for you." He looked sorry when he said it, for he probably remembered his own little ones at home, and was glad that they were not out in the cold.

Through the open door a light, oh, such a bright light, shone, and it was so warm ! But the child turned away into the cold and darkness, not knowing why the footman spoke so, for surely the children would have loved to have another little companion to join in their joyous Christmas festival.

But the children did not know that the child had knocked.

The street seemed colder and darker to the child than before, and the bright windows were not nearly so bright, because the child was sad. But all along, on both sides of the wide street, the light streamed out, and it was almost as bright as day; and the beauty all about made the little child glad again.

The great city was full of happy homes that night, and the cold outside was entirely forgotten. All remembered only the happy time, and no doubt thought that every single person in the whole wide world was happy, too.

Farther and farther along, down where the homes were not quite so large or beautiful, the little child wandered. There seemed to be children inside of nearly all the houses, and they were dancing and frolicking about; there were Christmas-trees in nearly every window, with beautiful dolls and toys; there were trumpets and picture books, and all sorts of nice things; and in one place a sweet little lamb made of white wool was hanging on the tree for one of the children.

The child, stopping before this window, looked and looked at the beautiful thing, and creeping up to the glass gently tapped upon the pane. A little girl came to the window and looked out into the dark street and saw the child. But she only frowned and shook her head and said, "Come some other time, for we cannot take care of you now," and then she went away.

The little child turned back into the cold again, and went sadly on, saying, "Will no one share the beautiful Christmas with me? The light is so bright and I love it so!" The child wandered on and on, scarcely seeing the light now, on account of tears.

The street became darker and narrower; farther and farther the little one traveled. It grew late. Scarcely any one was out to meet the child as it walked, and all the outer world was still and cold.

Ahead there suddenly appeared a bright, single ray of light, that shone right through the darkness into the child's eyes. The child smiled and said, "I will go and see if they will share their Christmas with me."

Hastening past all the other houses, the little one went straight up to the window-pane from which the light was streaming. It was such a poor, little, low house, but the child saw only the light in the window, for there was neither curtain nor shade. What do you suppose the light came from? Nothing but a tiny, tallow candle! But it seemed to the little wanderer almost as bright as the sun. That was because the child was glad again. The candle was placed in an old cup with a broken handle, and right in the same cup there was a twig of evergreen, and that was all the Christmas-tree they had.

And who do you suppose was in the house?

A beautiful mother with a baby on her knee, and a little one beside her. The children were both looking into their mother's face and listening to her words. A few bright coals were burning in the fireplace, which made it light and warm within. The child crept closer to the window, and gently, oh, so gently, tapped on the pane. They all listened.

“Shall I open the door, dear mother?” the little girl asked.

“Certainly, my child. No one must be left out in the cold on our beautiful Christmas eve. Open the door and let the stranger come in.”

The door was thrown wide open and the little girl looked into the darkness; when she saw the child she put out her little hand to help. The child went in—into the light and warmth. Then the mother put out her hands and touched the little child. The children said, “Dear little one, you are cold and naked; come and let us warm you and love you, and then you shall have some of our Christmas.”

The baby crept out of its mother's lap and she gathered the little stranger to her, and the children stood at her knee, and warmed the cold hands and feet, and rubbed them, and smoothed the tangled curls, and kissed the child's face; the mother put her arms about the three little ones, and the candle and the firelight shone over them all, and everything was so still.

And the mother's sweet voice spoke in the stillness.

"Little ones," she said, "shall I tell you the real Christmas story?"

The children said, "yes," so the mother began :

"Many, many years ago, this very night, some shepherds were out on the plains watching their sheep. The wee little lambs were asleep, and the large sheep were sleeping, too. The stars shone bright and clear above, and all was very still below. The shepherds sat beside each other without a word, leaning on their crooks and hardly moving.

"Suddenly, a great light shone all around about them, right through the darkness; they did not know what it was, and they were all afraid.

“Then an angel, white and beautiful, came to them from out the light, and told them not to fear, for great joy and gladness had come to the whole world. A little babe had just been born which was to become their King, and save them from all wrong and suffering, and do great good for them and all mankind. The angel then showed the shepherds where to find the babe, saying that it would be wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger.

“And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good will toward men. And a wonderful light was all about them, and when the angel had gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, let us go and see this child of which the angel told us. So they left their lambs sleeping on the plains, and took their crooks in their hands and started out.

“It was a long way, but a shining star was before them and they followed it even up to the place where the angel had told them. And they found the babe lying in a manger, and when they had seen it, they told all the people that came to see the child, of what they had seen that night on the plains, and how the angel had told them to come to the child, and of the wonderful light which had made them afraid, and how the multitude had sung. All they that had heard it wondered at the things which were told them by the shepherds. The mother of the little babe was very glad and remembered all these things.

“The kind shepherds departed and went back to their flocks, telling every one they met, of the young child.

“They called the child Jesus, and the child grew, and was strong and beautiful, and Jesus taught the whole world how they should love one another and be good, even as our Father in heaven is good and loves us.”

The sweet voice of the mother ceased.

The light in the room had grown brighter, until now it shone like the sun ; from the floor to the ceiling, all was light as day. And lo, when the little ones turned to look for the child, the mother's lap was empty ; there was nothing to be seen ; the child was gone, but the light was still in the room.

"Children," the mother said quietly, "I believe we have had the real Christ Child with us to-night." And she drew her dear ones to her and kissed them, and there was great joy in the little house.

"And whoso receiveth one such little child in my name receiveth me."

"For lo ! I am with you always."

The Boy in the Temple.

The Boy in the Temple.

IN far-off Palestine, in years long past, the people of the villages and farms, once a year went to the city of Jerusalem to celebrate the great feast.

They would start out in little parties from the different hamlets and there would join them on the road, one by one, other travelers who were off on the same errand.

Great troops would enter the city together, and indeed it was much safer that they remain in close companies on the road.

And such happy, chatting, visiting neighbors as they were, for it took many long days of travel to come and many more before they reached home again.

Often whole families, mother, father and children went together, riding and walking, and resting by the way.

The boy Jesus, with Mary and Joseph, took this long journey, too, and many other little folks were along. Such a happy band as they were. The boys and girls would often rest themselves by mounting the camels and donkeys behind their mothers and then be better ready for their long tramp.

They would stop by the way for their bread and meat and to sleep at night, so it took several days before they reached Jerusalem, where the feast was to be held.

Little Elizabeth, the neighbor's child, who lived in the house beyond that of Mary and Joseph, was a warm-hearted little girl of nine, and close companion to the boy Jesus. They would often stop and watch the long procession of friends and neighbors pass with their camels and bundles, and then, before their mothers and fathers, far to the front, were lost to sight they would run swiftly ahead and join them again.

And no one ever feared they would be lost for all were going the same way and would guide the little ones.

At last they entered the great gates of Jerusalem, where the whole caravan parted to find their resting places.

Mary and Joseph went to the house of some friends, but Elizabeth pleaded so hard that Jesus might go with her and her parents, that it was finally allowed, for both the families were to return together; and besides, his mother was quite sure he could take care of himself, for he was twelve years old.

The little boy and girl were very happy together, and loved most of all to go to the great temple where so many were always coming and going.

On the morning of the day upon which they were to return to their home the two made one more visit and looked once more at the great walls and the wonderful crowd.

They sat down on a step to rest and Jesus comforted Elizabeth for she was very weary. She leaned against him and he told her softly of his Father who dwelt in heaven and how always he was rested at the thought of Him.

As he was teaching this little girl what he knew of his Father, a tall man in robes leaned over him and kindly said, "What is this, my lad?"

The sweet boy looked him in the face and said,

"I but told Elizabeth, who is weary, of the Father who rests and comforts us all. Do you know of Him?"

The man took him by the hand and said, "Tell me of Him."

And he led the children through the great temple door and far into the heart of the wonderful building where there sat five wise priests who taught the people of God.

And the man in the robes told them of the children and of their sayings and the great priests asked what Jesus meant.

He answered their questions and they were astonished at his answers for they saw that he truly believed that his Father was God of whom they taught, but did not understand. Jesus told them how this Father did all things for him, and showed them how by believing on Him and asking of Him we received. And many questions they asked him and he answered them all clearly.

That day he was in the temple with the great priests and on the morrow they again asked him of his Father, and his words made them all wonder.

On the third day as he sat in the midst of the priests, Mary and Joseph found him. They were greatly troubled for they had traveled a long way before they learned that the two children were not in the party homeward bound. And Jesus told them how he had taught the great priests of his Father in heaven, which it was well they should know.

He left the five priests with loving adieux and they were richly blessed with his wonderful sayings. And the father and mother with the two little ones, made haste to join their friends who had gone far ahead of them, and very soon the happy families were together again in Nazareth.

NEW YEAR'S BLOSSOMS.

The New Year's Message.

NEW YEAR'S BLOSSOMS.

The New Year's Message.

The New Year's Message.

ALL the year round the three great bells of the village spoke to each other, back and forth from belfry to belfry, nodding and swinging. Each had but one word to say and he said it over and over, asking and answering in the very same tone.

One would throw himself up into the air and hang there trembling all over—his great tongue quivering—waiting for the answer from his neighbor, with the shining brass sides, that hung in the tower across the little stream. And then from far down the valley would peel forth the ring of the third great bell. All this while the first one was waiting for his turn to speak again.

These bells hung and swung far above the heads of everybody in the village. They had but one thing to say and one way to say it, but since the people did not understand, it did very well and every one loved these three brothers and never questioned what they meant. Though they did not speak in the same tone, they were of one mind, and even when they spoke together they did not jangle in the least, but sounded so sweetly—especially in the ears of the children—who always stopped and looked up. And whenever they spoke together thus they told that a little child was born—somewhere in the village some one had a little new brother or sister, and so the children smiled. And when the year was born perhaps that was why the ringing brought them such joy.

“Hark, hark, the bells!”

Every one in the village awoke at twelve o'clock on New Year's Eve, except the children, for out on to the night there poured the rich clanging of the bells.

All the grown people got up, peered out of the window, saw the clear sky and the ocean of stars, then they wished each other a very sleepy "Happy New Year," saying that they hoped it would bring some good with it, and back they went to sleep again.

But the children did not wake up—they dreamed on and on under their coverlets; perhaps some of them turned over or stretched themselves, but not a single one opened an eye. Was n't it strange?

But when the frosty light of the morning poured over the houses from out the sky, every single child in the village started out of dreamland, and such dreams as they did tell! From one end of the village to the other every household where there were any children, heard wonder-tales that could scarcely be believed. They told of having seen flower-beds right out in the snow, and of music and lights all over everything. They told of children with the happiest faces, laughing and playing and dancing and singing, and one little girl awoke in her cradle and found some beautiful flowers had blossomed right out of the dream and were still in her hand.

And every one came and marveled over it, and smelled the flowers and knew that they were real. This little one had listened perhaps the best of all to what the dream said, and so the dream came true.

What had come to all the little ones? The wise people of the village were all puzzled, for no one, not even the old sextons who pulled the ropes had noticed anything strange in the ringing.

There were many old men and women in the village who had heard the bells for years and years, and they did not know as much about their meaning as the little folks, and how they all wondered at the dreams that came to the children on that New Year's night.

This must have been the way it all came about.—A beautiful friend who had told the children stories and taught them wonderful things, had asked each to watch for the message of the New Year which comes after the Christ-Child's birth.

Every child that was loving and helpful and trusting would hear on the eve of the New Year a wonder-tale, and don't you see each child went to sleep that night waiting and watching for it, and it had to come. If the grown people had done the same it would probably have come to them, too,—but they are often too busy to hear and see even the most beautiful things. We are glad that children are not.

The bells have a really deep story to tell that very few have ever guessed, and what they tell seems easier for the children to understand than for grown folks; it is about the childhood of the year.

The song that the New Year sings through the lips of a bell is something like this, if we put it into words :

“ Good people, awake,
And list to the bell :—
Begin with the year
To know that all's well.”

Listen ! and perhaps on New Year's Eve each one of us may hear the happiest greeting, so that the next day when we call out a "glad New Year" to every friend we meet, there will be so much joy in it that they will be gladder than they ever were before.

A Flower Carol.

A Flower Carol.

A WAKE, awake, my buds of white !”
The mother primrose said,
“ Lift up each dainty head !

And with your petals pure, uncurled,
Sing of the Christ-Child, born to-night,
Into a frozen world !”

Each snowy blossom started up
From its sweet budding sleep,
And one by one began to creep
From out the primrose mother’s lap ;
And gently, every flower cup
Unfolded from its nap.

And opening wide their sweet lips white,
The primrose children told
From out their hearts of gold,
The story of the child so dear,—
The child that came on Christmas night,—
The child that still is here.

The only words the flowers had
 With which to sing their song,—
 So full and sweet and strong,—
 Were precious scents of rich perfume.
And from their fresh-blown petals glad,
 It rose and filled the room.

The Old Bell.

The Old Bell.

ARING-A-RING, ring ! A-ring-a-ring, ring !

“ Brother Carl, wake up, wake up ! Don't you hear the great bell ? Father is ringing the New Year in, don't you hear it, little Carl ? Wake up ! ”

Tangled-haired little Carl sat up in bed, rubbed his eyes, and after a few winks opened them wide.

“ Is it the wind, brother Hans, that sings so ? ”

“ No, no ! It is the great bell, don't you hear it ring ? It is ringing for the New Year. ”

“ Is father drawing the rope ? ” asked the little one.

“ Of course he is, little Carl ; he is waking up the whole world that every one may wish a 'Happy New Year.' Come let us go to the window."

And the two little fellows crept out of their warm nest on to the cold floor, and over to the window in the gable.

"O see, there is father's lantern in the steeple window!" cried Carl.

It threw its light into the frosty night; the clear stars cut sharp holes in the sky, and the air was so cold that it made everything glisten.

A-ring-a-ring, ring! clanged the great bell, and little Hans and Carl knew that father's arms were making it ring. The strokes were so strong that each one made little half-asleep Carl wink, and the stars seemed to wink back to him each time. He crept closer to Hans, and the two stood still with their arms about each other; the room was quite cold, but they did not mind it, for with each stroke the great bell seemed to ring more beautifully. It seemed so near them, as if ringing right in their ears, and the two little boys stood and listened with beating hearts.

"I saw dear father fix his lantern," whispered Hans. "He set it near the door before we went to bed, all ready to light when the clock struck twelve. Mother said to him as he put the lantern there, 'Ring the bell good and strong, dear father, for who knows but this year may bring the great blessing which the Christ-Child promised!' We must watch for it little Carl."

And the old bell seemed to speak louder and clearer to the little ones, as they eagerly listened for what it was telling.

"Father says the bell will never ring from the old tower again for the new one is being built," says Hans. "And what do you think, brother Carl, our dear mother wept because the old steeple must be broken down, and the dear bell, that is even now a-ringing, must be put into another great tower to ring."

"Does the great bell know it brother?"

"No, dear little Carl; but no matter where it is put it will always ring, and be glad to wake the village for the New Year."

"Will we go and say good-bye to the dear old bell, brother Hans?" whispered little Carl.

"Yes, dear brother mine, when it is day we will go, for it has rung so many times for us."

They crept out of the cold into their snug bed again, and the great strokes poured from the tower window long after the little curly heads were full of dreams.

"Wake up, brother Hans! there is the sun." This time, little Carl was the first to arise. Quickly they were both dressed, and opening their door noiselessly they went down the narrow stairs on tiptoe, and then out into the open air.

A swift wind was blowing. It swept over the bare bushes and whirled the snow into the children's faces, and filled their curly hair with flakes. But the sun was smiling down on them and said, "See what a beautiful day I brought for a New Year's gift to you!"

And the little ones passed through the church door, that was always open, and into the belfry tower. They knew the way, for father had so often taken them with him.

They came to the long, dark ladder-way; but they did not mind the dark—for they knew the bell was at the top, and they bravely began to climb.

Hans had wooden shoes, so he left them at the foot of the ladder. It is so much easier to climb a ladder with bare feet. Besides, he hardly felt the cold he was such a quick and lively little boy.

Carl went ahead, that brother Hans might the more easily help him. They climbed, up and up, and the brave big brother talked merrily all the time to keep little Carl from thinking of the long, long way. Up and up they went. It became darker and darker.

Little Carl led on and on, and he was glad that Hans was behind him.

All at once a bright stream of light greeted them from above, and they knew that soon they would be with the dear old bell.

Through the opening they crept, and there the great bell hung and they stood beneath it. Hans could just touch it, and he felt of its long tongue, and saw the shining marks of its sides where it had struck in clanging for many, many years.

It was very cold in the belfry. Little Carl tucked his hands under his blouse and gazed at the bell, while Hans explained to him what made the music, and the great tolling tones came from it.

"The whole world loves the great bell, brother Carl," said Hans. "Mother thinks that last night it rang in the great blessing which the Christ-Child had promised."

"What did the little Christ-Child promise, brother?"

"Don't you remember, little Carl? Mother told us that the Christ-Child would send little children a beautiful gift ; I think it must be the New Year that he has sent, for that is what the old bell brought to us last night."

And Hans lifted little Carl, and he kissed the beautiful bell on its great round lip, and the bell was still warm from its long ringing.

And they stood and looked at the bell quietly for a long time. And then they said, "Good-bye, dear great bell," and they went down the long, dark ladder again.

Hans put on his wooden shoes at the foot of the ladder, and with flying feet they crossed the church garden, and there stood the dear mother in the door looking for them. She had found their little bed empty, and was just starting out to find them.

"Dear mother, we have been in the tower to thank the great bell for bringing the New Year," cried Hans.

"Did the Christ-Child send it, mother?" asked little Carl.

And the mother stooped down and put her arms about them and kissed them both. As she led them into the room she said, "Yes, my little ones, the Christ-Child sends the New Year."

The Carolers.

The Carolers.

WELVE little sleepy boys, rubbing their eyes (and stretching their mouths as wide as ever they could with yawns) were standing in the snow, waiting.

They were right under the window of their dear old godfather's house, and it was early Christmas morning, long before daylight had thought of breaking.

Suddenly out on the frosty air their voices spoke, chiming so sweetly that the dear godfather must certainly have thought he was dreaming of angels as he waked.

Upstairs, inside the house, in his own little bedroom, and on his own old-fashioned bed, the old man lay. Suddenly he sat up, brushed his night-cap away from his ears, and this is what he heard :

" Carol, brothers, carol,
 Carol joyfully ;
 Carol the good tidings,
 Carol merrily.
 Carol but in gladness,
 Not in songs of earth,
 On the Saviour's birthday
 Hallowed by our mirth."

And the dear godfather wiped away a tear, for he knew that these little lads must surely love him, if they would creep out of their trundle beds so early on a cold morning to remind him of the Christ-Child and his coming.

The good old man crept out of his warm bed to go to the window. Just then the singer began the second verse :

" While the heavens are telling
 To mankind good-will,
 Only love and kindness
 Every bosom fill.

And pray a gladsome Christmas
For all good Christian men,
Carol, brothers, carol,
Christmas-day again."

He threw open the window wide, and called to his little godchildren, and they came into the large hall and warmed themselves by the fireplace. He gave them raisins and cakes to eat, for they had not had any breakfast.

Then by the candle-light the godfather showed them beautiful pictures of the Christ-Child and its lovely mother. He told them how Jesus loved the world and served the poor and sick.

And there in the fire-light the boys sang their sweet songs over and over for him, and when the beautiful Christmas morning broke over the village, the godfather kissed each rosy face and sent his beloved godchildren with gifts in their hands to go to the poor and old, to wake them with their joyful songs of Christ's birth.

Christmas Wreaths.

Christmas Wreaths.

OH LET us wind the holly
In Christmas garlands gay,
It lives so long and glistens
When roses fade away!

Wind it on the stairs and windows
And on the cradles, too,—
The babies love the holly
Quite as much as you.

Christmas was made for babies,
All their own to keep ;
It's the birthday of that Baby
Who was cradled with the sheep.

Here's holly for the babies !
And on their cribs upstairs
We'll weave its branches, green and red,
For Christmas-day is theirs.

pic

EX 68

